From Acorns to Warehouses:
A Look at the Inland Empire Through the Ages

Thomas Patterson
Distinguished Professor of Anthropology

Anthropology professor Thomas Patterson’s latest book, “From Acorns to Warehouses: Historical Political Economy of Southern California’s Inland Empire,” examines the social, political and economic changes in Inland Southern California from thousands of years ago to the present. Patterson traces the history of the Inland Empire and seeks to explain how the region came to be the way it is today. Much of the scholarly work, as well as fiction about Southern California views our region as an extension of what is happening in Los Angeles. His goal is to consider the Inland Empire as its own distinctive space, one that has changing linkages with the coastal counties, the state, the country, and the global economy.

Professor Thomas Patterson’s family migrated from Central Maine to Pomona in the 1950’s. He received a BA at UCR and a PhD from Berkeley in anthropology. Professor Patterson has taught at Berkeley, Harvard, Yale, Temple and the New School for Social Research. He came back to the region after over 30 years when he joined UCR as chair of the Anthropology Department. When he returned, the region “was so different from what I remembered. The orange groves were gone. Commercial dairy farms had moved out and were replaced by houses and warehouses.”
